

The sheer number of active fund managers coupled with the shared technologies that they all utilize for analysis and decisions results in most of them coming to similar conclusions about how securities and commodities are going to perform. Only a small fraction of actively managed funds succeed in meeting their benchmarks yet they still charge high fees compared to their passively managed counterparts.